

Autumn Campbell currently serves as the Director of Public Policy and Advocacy for the National Association of Area Agencies on Aging (n4a). She gained a passion for issues affecting older adults and caregivers across the country when, in her early thirties, she took on the role of caregiver for her mother.

In addition to n4a, Autumn has a broad portfolio of experience and has worked for over 13 years for DC-based associations and nonprofits. She has worked on issues including transportation and economic development, homeless services, workforce development, rural development, housing, and community and social services policies. She has also worked both for Congress and as a reporter for the Capitol Hill-based publication Roll Call. Autumn attended the University of Missouri-Columbia where she studied journalism and psychology.
