

Kevin Carey is the vice president for education policy and knowledge management at New America and directs New America's Education Policy program. He writes regularly for The Upshot at The New York Times and has written feature articles on education policy and other subjects for Wired, The New Republic, Pacific Standard, Washington Monthly, and other publications. His book, The End of College: Creating the Future of Learning and the University of Everywhere was published by Riverhead in 2015.

Prior to joining New America, Carey worked as the policy director of Education Sector, and as an analyst at the Education Trust and the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities. He has also worked for the Indiana Senate Finance Committee and as Indiana's Assistant State Budget Director. Carey has a bachelor's degree in political science from Binghamton University and master's degree in public administration from the Ohio State University.