

James Clouse is currently a senior fellow at the Andersen Institute for Economics and Finance. Prior to joining the Andersen Institute, Mr. Clouse served as an economist at the Federal Reserve Board. For many years, Mr. Clouse served as a deputy director in the Division of Monetary Affairs at the Federal Reserve Board. In that capacity, he was heavily involved in a range of topics including monetary policy implementation, lender of last resort and liquidity, large scale asset purchases as a tool for monetary policy, financial institutions and markets, monetary policy and financial stability, and monetary policy strategy and communications. During his time at the Federal Reserve, Mr. Clouse regularly attended meetings of the Federal Open Market Committee (FOMC) and served as Secretary of the FOMC for five years. In that role, among other duties, Mr. Clouse was responsible for all aspects of the conduct and records for FOMC meetings including the preparation of the minutes of FOMC meetings. Mr. Clouse also served as Deputy Assistant Secretary for Federal Finance while on detail at the U.S. Treasury in 2006; in that role, Mr. Clouse was responsible for all aspects of Treasury debt management. Prior to joining the Federal Reserve, Mr. Clouse served four years in the U.S. Army. Mr. Clouse holds a Ph.D. in economics from Northwestern University and a B.A. in economics from Princeton University.