

Huther Bio

Jeff Huther is an adjunct Professor of Economics at Georgetown University where he teaches a class on Monetary Policy Implementation. He has a wide range of experience in government and the private sector, including more than ten years at the Federal Reserve, largely focused on analysis of U.S. money markets, and six years at the U.S. Treasury in the Office of Debt Management. He has written government-banking interactions for the American Bankers Association, overseen financial engineering at Freddie Mac, and developed portfolio analytics at the New Zealand Treasury. He has a B.S. in Chemistry from St. Lawrence University, an M.A. in Economic Policy from Boston University, and a Ph.D. in Economics from Georgetown University.