

Patrice Tomcik is the Senior National Field Manager for Moms Clean Air Force where she manages the oil and gas program, field program, and field operations. She is passionate about public health, and her work focuses on equitable solutions to protect children's health from air pollution and climate change through advocacy actions as well as regulatory and policy work at all levels of government.

Patrice first became involved in fighting for children's environmental health protections when gas wells were permitted to be fracked a half mile from her children's schools in southwestern Pennsylvania. Patrice joined with other parents to advocate for health and safety protections for the children in her community, which launched her volunteer work with Moms Clean Air Force. Ever since, she has been advocating for children's health protections from air pollution and climate change working for Moms Clean Air Force.
