

Stig is the president and founder of the Postsecondary Commission. The Postsecondary Commission is seeking federal recognition as an accreditor for new and existing institutions of higher education that create high levels of economic mobility for their students, are innovative in their designs, act with transparency, and are accountable for student outcomes. Stig is also a part-time senior lecturer at Harvard Business School where he teaches entrepreneurship.

Stig began his career as a high-tech entrepreneur mainly at Amazon.com, and he has worked extensively over several decades as a social entrepreneur focused on K-16 education reform in the United States. He has founded and led several successful education-related nonprofits related variously to charter schools and teacher training (Match Education), open-source curriculum (Fishtank Learning) and alternative college models (Duet).

Stig holds a Bachelor of Arts in comparative literature (summa cum laude, Phi Beta Kappa) from Princeton University (1992) and a combined JD-MBA degree from Harvard Law School and Harvard Business School (1998). Stig lives in Brookline, Massachusetts, with his wife, Sherry Riva. They have three daughters.
