

Candace Rondeaux is the Director of the Future Frontlines program at the New America Foundation. Based in Washington, DC, she is also a Professor of Practice at the Center on the Future of War in the School of Politics & Global Studies at Arizona State University. A journalist and public policy analyst by training, she is a faculty fellow at the Melikian Center for Russian, Eurasian, and East European Studies at ASU. Her additional faculty affiliations include the Security Studies program at the Elliott School of International Affairs, at George Washington University where she lectures on conflict studies and at Tulane University where she serves on the Emergency & Security Studies Advisory Board. An expert in political violence and conflict studies, she also serves on the advisory board of the Bridging Divides Initiative at Princeton University and Airwars, a research organization focused on monitoring civilian casualties in war zones. She writes regularly for the World Politics Review and the Daily Beast on the intersection of emerging tech, political violence and geopolitical competition.

Before joining New America, Rondeaux served as a senior program officer at the U.S. Institute of Peace where she launched the RESOLVE Network, a global research consortium on conflict and violent extremism and as a strategic advisor to the U.S. Special Inspector General for Afghanistan Reconstruction. She has documented and analyzed political violence in South Asia, and around the world for the Washington Post and the International Crisis Group where she served for five years as Senior Analyst for Afghanistan in Kabul. Before going abroad for the Post in 2009, Rondeaux covered criminal justice in Maryland and Virginia, where she covered capital punishment and she was part of the Pulitzer Prize winning team of Post reporters who covered the 2007 Virginia Tech massacre. In 2004, while on a reporting sabbatical from covering criminal justice in Florida for the St. Petersburg Times, she reported on energy security issues in the Caucasus as an International Reporting Fellow at Johns Hopkins School of Advanced International Studies. She holds a B.A. in Russian area studies from Sarah Lawrence College, an M.A. in journalism from New York University, and an M.P.P. in public policy from the Woodrow Wilson School of Public and International Affairs at Princeton University.