

Kasper Agger is the Enough Project's Uganda-based field researcher. His work focuses on the Lord's Resistance Army (LRA); on-the-ground research in the remote areas of Uganda, South Sudan, Congo and the Central African Republic that have been most affected by the LRA crisis; and advocacy based research with the aim to identify recommendations and solutions to the LRA conflict.

Prior to joining the Enough Project, Agger spend two years with Northern Uganda Peace Initiative providing input to the Juba peace process. He also worked for the U.N. Environmental Program with implementation of clean energy projects across Africa. Agger has setup several social ventures in Africa, including a grassroots reconciliation initiative in Northern Uganda and a culinary school for Kenyan youths in the Masai Mara National Park.

Agger holds a combined M.A. in Geography and International Development Studies from Roskilde University in Denmark and a B.A in social sciences. He is a passionate chef, writer and video producer, with a portfolio that includes Ugandan pop music videos.
