

John Stauffer served with the United States Peace Corps in Eritrea from 1966 to 1968, teaching English and science to rural middle school students there. He then embarked on what was to become a long corporate career in the U.S. In 2003, after the worst of the repression within Eritrea began, he joined with one of his star Peace Corps students – who had attained educational and professional success and was now an asylee living in the U.S. – in founding a precursor to The America Team for Displaced Eritreans, which was officially established in in 2010. Based in Southeastern Pennsylvania, The America Team assists Eritrean refugees and asylum seekers in the United States and around the world – through resettlement services, policy advocacy, and life-saving interventions on behalf of Eritreans in perilous circumstances.
