

R. Kim Cragin, PhD is the senior research fellow for counterterrorism at the Institute for National Strategic Studies, National Defense University. Dr. Cragin has conducted research on terrorism for the past 20 years. Prior to joining the National Defense University, she was a senior political scientist at the RAND Corporation. She also has taught at Georgetown University and the University of Maryland. Dr. Cragin served as senior staff to the 9/11 FBI Review Commission. In the spring of 2008, she spent three months on General Petraeus' (ret.) staff in Baghdad. Dr. Cragin has conducted fieldwork in Pakistan, Yemen, Egypt, Algeria, the West Bank and Gaza Strip, northwest China, Indonesia, the Philippines, and Sri Lanka, among others. Her mixed methods research focuses on counter-terrorism strategies, radicalization and recruitment, terrorist groups' use of new technologies, and arms trafficking.

Dr. Cragin has published widely in both academic and policy journals. Her most recent publications include "The Challenge of Foreign Fighter Returnees," which was released by the Journal of Contemporary Criminal Justice in April 2017; "The November 2015 Paris Attacks," available in Orbis, Spring 2017; and, "Old Becomes New Again: Kidnappings by Daesh and other Salafi Jihadists," released by Studies in Conflict and Terrorism, January 2016. Among her many RAND monograph reports are Why Do Individuals Reject Violent Extremism? (2016 and 2017); Social Science for Counterterrorism (2009) and Dissuading Terror (2004). Dr. Cragin has a Masters Degree in Public Policy from Duke University. She completed her Ph.D at Cambridge University (Clare College) in the United Kingdom.