

The Official Story On Trump's Shooting Makes No Sense At All

Seventy-two hours after an assassin shot and nearly killed Donald Trump in Pennsylvania, here's the official story so far: A random 20-year-old acting completely alone walked within 150 yards of a presidential campaign rally with a rifle, climbed onto a rooftop in full view of Secret Service snipers, set up his shot and fired without anyone intervening and with no help from anyone.

This 20-year-old is also so politically radical as to attempt an assassination and yet not radical enough to have ever posted any political writings or commentary on any social media site ever in his life. He also wrote no manifesto and left behind no indication about why he did it. Even after authorities gained access to his phone, they say they still have no clue about his motivations. All we're told is that, for some reason, he obviously wanted Donald Trump dead. There's just a handful of videos of the shooter circulating, including one in which he makes some weird sexual joke, and one in which he appears briefly in a Blackrock video featuring his high school classroom. Other than that, it's as if he never existed.

As far as we can tell, this man's last and only political act, before attempting to kill the Republican candidate, was to register as a Republican. Oh and apparently, there were Trump signs outside of his parent's home, where he was living.

We have no idea why these signs are outside the shooter's home. We have no clarity on this point whatsoever because none of this makes sense and no one's explaining anything. Nevertheless, you must believe the official narrative and ask no questions about it or else you are a conspiracy theorist. And one thing we know about assassination attempts is that there's never any conspiring involved.

As unbelievable and insulting as it is, this is the version of events you're being told to accept. But with every hour that goes by, it somehow makes even less sense than it did before. Every new detail is more baffling than the last.

Last night, for instance CBS News reported that several Beaver County police snipers were stationed inside the building the shooter eventually climbed on top of. They were supposedly looking for threats in the crowd at the rally. There were no officers or snipers on the roof, for reasons that remain unexplained, even though that'd be the rational spot to place these snipers. But it's now an uncontested fact that the shooter used the police staging area as a vantage point to shoot Donald Trump.

According to the local outlet Beaver Countian, which broke the story,

A security operations plan had placed each of the three counter-snipers inside of the building looking out of windows toward the rally, with none stationed on its roof. Due to a lack of manpower, the men did not have spotters assigned to them, as would be standard operating procedure.

So maybe the excuse is that they couldn't spare anyone to watch the roof. They just ran out of people. Obviously we need to know exactly who drafted that "security operations plan," because that person should never be in charge of any security operation ever again.
