

Bauer and Rose: There, but for the Grace of God, NO DATE NO AUTHOR, THIS IS A PODCAST

In this episode of The Bauer and Rose Podcast, Tom Rose and Gary Bauer confront the shocking assassination attempt on former President Donald Trump at a campaign rally. They discuss the deeply entrenched hatred that has been cultivated against Trump over the years, leading to this inevitable yet shocking event. The hosts highlight the media's role in perpetuating this vitriol and the dangerous consequences of dehumanizing political opponents.

Tom and Gary delve into the failures of the Secret Service and the broader implications for national security, questioning the priorities and competence of those charged with protecting the former president. They also examine the cultural and political climate that has allowed such hatred to fester, calling for a full investigation into the incident and the immediate cessation of ongoing prosecutions against Trump.

The episode also touches on the broader societal issues at play, including the leftist ideology permeating law enforcement and other institutions. The hosts argue that the violence and hatred come predominantly from the left, and they stress the need for moral courage and unity in the face of these challenges.

As they reflect on the resilience of America and the symbolic significance of Trump's survival, Tom and Gary call for a return to civility and a rejection of the divisive rhetoric that has poisoned the American political landscape. They end with a heartfelt prayer for the nation and its leaders, emphasizing the importance of healing and unity.
