American Enterprise Institute (AEI) senior fellow Edward J. Pinto is the co-director of AEI's Housing Center. He has done ground-breaking research on the role of federal housing policy in the 2008 financial crisis and growing unaffordability. His current focus is on state, local, and federal policy flexibilities that can address supply and affordability challenges, along with policy options for replacing our government-centric housing finance system with a market-based housing finance market. Active in housing finance for over 50 years, he was an executive vice president and chief credit officer for Fannie Mae until the late 1980s. Pinto has a JD from Indiana University and a BA from the University of Illinois.
