Dear Representatives Clark and Rogers,

On behalf of the American Academy of Addiction Psychiatry, representing nearly 2,000 Addiction Psychiatrists, I am writing to thank you for your leadership in authoring legislation to create a student loan forgiveness program for addiction treatment professionals. Your bill, the Substance Use Disorder Workforce Loan Repayment Act of 2018, would improve access to desperately needed substance use treatment services for millions of Americans across the country.

Across the nation, communities are confronting an opioid addiction crisis while at the same time experiencing an ongoing labor shortage among addiction professionals, slowing the response to the crisis. According to the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration (SAMHSA), 22 million Americans aged 12 or older have experienced a substance use disorder. Yet only 1 in every 10 people living with addiction receives treatment services. Your legislation would help addiction treatment providers meet the rising demand for treatment by strengthening their ability to attract and retain high-quality staff.

One major barrier to confronting our nation's opioid crisis is the lack of a sufficient addiction treatment workforce. Community-based addiction and mental health treatment providers report high turnover rates and difficulty in filling vacant positions. Salaries in behavioral health care—particularly in addiction services—are well below those for parallel positions in other health care sectors and in business (SAMHSA, 2013). Your bill offers providers a powerful recruitment tool to increase the number of dedicated and well-trained addiction treatment professionals working in high-need communities, including those areas hit-hard by the opioid epidemic.

Loan forgiveness programs have proven successful in helping primary care and mental health clinics attract a well-trained workforce into medically underserved areas, yet addiction treatment providers have not had the same access to federal loan forgiveness funds. By creating a loan forgiveness program dedicated specifically to substance use disorder services, your legislation would grow the availability of substance use disorder treatment professionals. By increasing addiction treatment capacity nationwide, your bill helps to implement a comprehensive strategy to address the nation's growing addiction crisis.

Thank you for your dedication to expanding access to lifesaving treatment for millions of Americans living with substance use disorders. AAAP looks forward to working with you and your colleagues to see this important legislation through to passage.

Sincerely,
