Background

The Fort McDermitt Paiute Tribe and Shoshone Tribe both share the Fort McDermitt Reservation, Humboldt County, Nevada and Malheur County, Oregon. The reservation, originally established by Executive Order in 1867, is approximately 32,000 acres in size and is 75 miles north of Winnemucca, Nevada. The land was allotted under the General Allotment Act of 1887 and it was further opened to homesteading by non-Indians. A number of Acts of Congress have authorized the reacquisition of some of these lands by the tribes. Currently, the tribes have approximately 16,000 acres of trust land. The tribes plan to use the land transferred under the bill for the development of natural resources.

The Duck Valley Reservation, on the Nevada-Idaho border (Elko County, Nevada, and Owyhee County, Idaho), began with the Treaty of Ruby Valley in 1863 encompasses close to 290,000 acres. The reservation was established by several Executive Orders and an Act of Congress. The tribe plans to use the lands transferred under the bill to address a tribal housing shortage.

The Summit Lake Paiute Reservation, established by Executive Order in 1913, is located in northwestern Nevada (Humboldt County). It is more than 10,000 acres. This tribe is a part of the greater Paiute tribe, a large group of Indian people who occupied a large part of the eastern slopes of the Sierra and Cascades ranges until encroachment by non-Indians led to the creation of a reservation for their use and occupation. The reservation includes a small part of Summit Lake. The tribe plans to use the lands transferred under the bill for protection and management of Summit Lake including natural resources and a once abundant Lahontan cutthroat trout population.

The Reno-Sparks Indian Colony, in western Nevada near the California border, has a small amount of lands in Reno and nearly 2,000 acres in Hungry Valley. In 1916, Congress authorized the purchase of 8.42 acres as a site for the colony (similar to the manner in which Congress authorized the Department of the Interior to purchase lands for Rancherias). Though Congress did not designate these lands as a reservation or as a federal trust, in subsequent years, the Secretary of the Interior nonetheless treated the lands and the Indians living on it as a reservation and tribe with governance over it. The tribe plans to use the lands transferred under the bill to alleviate a housing strain, and for cultural preservation and development.

The Pyramid Lake Reservation is approximately a half-million acres in a remote part of Western Nevada, in Washoe, Lyon, and Stoney counties, 40 miles away from Reno. Several communities are within the reservation, including Nixon, Sutcliffe, and Wadsworth. Its reservation was formally established by Executive Order in 1874 after earlier orders by the government began to reserve this area for Paiute Indians after tensions arose with non-Indian settlers. About 112,000 acres of the reservation include Summit Lake, the state's largest, while the rest of the lands are high desert. Through receiving additional lands under the bill, the tribe plans to incorporate the watershed of Pyramid Lake. Other uses include potential economic development and management efficiency.

The Duckwater Indian Reservation of Shoshone Tribe is composed of approximately 300,000 acres and located in east-central Nevada, approximately 225 miles southeast of Elko. Though most of the reservation land is owned by the tribe, only 3,785 acres of land are held in trust. Due to the small land base the tribe has only 94 enrolled members on the reservation. The tribe has expressed that they would use additional land to support additional grazing and agricultural activities, promote renewable energy and economic development and housing.
