

John Horgan

John Horgan is Distinguished University Professor at Georgia State University's Department of Psychology where he directs the Violent Extremism Research Group (VERG). His research examines psychological factors related to involvement in (and disengagement from) terrorism. Horgan's work is widely published, with books including The Psychology of Terrorism (now in its second edition and published in multiple languages), Divided We Stand: The Strategy and Psychology of Ireland's Dissident Terrorists; Walking Away from Terrorism, Leaving Terrorism Behind, and Terrorism Studies: A Reader. He is the Editor-in-Chief of the journal Terrorism and Political Violence, Consulting Editor of Psychology of Violence, and serves on the Editorial Boards of several additional publications. He has held positions at the University of Massachusetts (Lowell), Penn State, University of St. Andrews, and University College, Cork. He frequently teaches and consults with the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Department of Homeland Security, and many other agencies tasked with responding to national and international security challenges. His research has been featured in such venues as The New York Times, Foreign Affairs, CNN, PBS, NPR, Vice News, Rolling Stone Magazine, TIME, Nature, Scientific American and the Chronicle of Higher Education. Horgan's latest book, Terrorist Minds, is forthcoming from Columbia University Press.
