

Redi Tlhabi is a highly distinguished, senior South African Journalist, Executive Producer, Radio and Television Presenter, columnist, moderator and Author, with over 25 years experience in international media. She is currently a Presenter on a global radio program on BBC World Service, and a sought-after Moderator, for amongst others, the United Nations General Assembly, WHO, the World Bank, IMF, Women Deliver and multiple UN agencies. She travels all over the world, moderating high level events and panel discussions on food security, sustainability, gender inequality, democracy and social justice. She is known for producing and presenting South Africa's longest running townhall format, debate television program The Big Debate, which brought together newsmakers, government officials, business leaders, researchers, and most importantly for Redi, communities that are affected by the decisions of those who are powerful. Redi has led teams of producers, filmmakers, and investigative journalists in producing world-class content covering an eclectic array of themes like climate change, poverty and inequality, education, foreign policy, the future of energy, amongst others. She is an Author of two award-winning socio-political books and has won South Africa's most prestigious literature prize, the Alan Paton Award for non-fiction. She has a strong grasp of global development, aid, and trade issues, with a particular focus on how to amplify voices from the Global South, Redi is very passionate about creating transformative platforms for global dialogues, where futures are negotiated. She is a prolific commentator on multiple media platforms like podcast, radio and television.
