Attachment—Additional Questions for the Record

The Honorable Eliot Engel

1. There seems to be consensus that we should expand broadband access in the United States, but of course it is expensive to build the necessary infrastructure. In New York, we have an aggressive broadband expansion plan that offsets high costs through a reverse auction process. We use data from the FCC to identify both unserved and underserved areas. Then we auction off grant money for each area, awarding financing to the private company that seeks the lowest state subsidy. The system has attracted many different providers, including major telecommunication companies like Fairpoint and Frontier, as well as small utilities like Middleburgh Telephone Company and Margaretville Telephone Company.

   a. Can you comment on New York's plan and whether you think we should adopt certain aspects of it on the federal level?
