2019:

- Government of Lichtenstein, Embassy of Lichtenstein: $9,000 for the Diplomatic Forum series, which brought together experts for private and public events focusing on transatlantic diplomacy, which often mentioned issues of Russian influence in Europe as it is a topic with increasing relevancy in the region.
- Government of the United Kingdom, Embassy of the United Kingdom: $6,500 for Modern Deterrence. A project focused on exploring the theory and principles of modern deterrence so that future defense leaders in NATO countries have a common basic grounding in the topic. The project is producing a video examining this topic, which includes discussion on contemporary Russian disinformation and influence.

2018:

- Government of Norway, Ministry of Foreign Affairs of Norway: $210,339 for an extended project examining NATO and transatlantic security, involving public events, workshops, and written publications. The hope is to engage experts and policy makers to better understand challenges to the international system, Russia's future, and adapting NATO's agenda.
- Government of Norway: $32,000 for work on security in Northern Europe and research on regional policies toward the Arctic. This includes Russian attempts to assert dominance in the Arctic through various construction projects.
- Government of Finland: $24,000 for work on Russian gray zone activity in Northern Europe.
