

Richard Salgado is Google LLC's Director for law enforcement and information security matters. Richard oversees Google's worldwide law enforcement and national security efforts, and legal matters relating to data security and investigations. Prior to joining Google, Richard was with Yahoo!, focusing on international security and law enforcement compliance work. He also served as senior counsel in the Computer Crime and Intellectual Property Section of the United States Department of Justice. As a federal prosecutor, Richard specialized in investigating and prosecuting computer network cases. In 2005, Richard joined Stanford Law School as a lecturer in law on modern surveillance law, computer crime, and Internet business legal and policy issues. He previously served as an adjunct law professor at Georgetown University Law Center and George Mason Law School and as a faculty member of the National Judicial College. Richard received his JD from Yale Law School.

Photo