

Erik joined WELC as a staff attorney in 2003 and became executive director in 2012. He has fought in court to safeguard our climate from dirty fossil fuels, promote our transition to a clean energy future, and protect the American West's rivers and wildlands. An expert in issues related to oil and gas development, Erik leads WELC's campaigns to phase out fossil fuels and build climate resilience. Prior to joining WELC, he worked as a public lands attorney for The Wilderness Society. Erik is a graduate of Cornell University with a B.S. in natural resources and concentration in American Indian Studies, and earned his law degree and a certificate in environmental & natural resources law from the University of Oregon School of Law.
