The 1996 publication of "Primary Colors: A Novel of Politics" caused a sensation in part because of the anonymity of its author, who was a key source for Bob Woodward and Carl Bernstein's reporting in The Post on the Watergate scandal. The book was a work of fiction, although its characters and events mirrored Bill Clinton's 1992 presidential campaign. The 1992 book "The Final Days" was later revealed to be columnist Joe Klein. The book was acquired with no advance for writing this book," Latimer said.

"Anonymous." Although the person does not mention the "Anonymous" columns, the author "feels their identity is protected," according to a statement about the book's release.

"Anonymous" will be published Nov. 19 by Twelve, an imprint of Grand Central Publishing/Hachette Book Group. It comes nearly two weeks after the overnight releases of two books that made explosive claims about President Trump. (One of the books was "The Room Where It Happened," by John Bolton, who was a key source for Bob Woodward and Carl Bernstein's reporting on the Watergate scandal. The other was "The Room Where It Happened," by Ronan Farrow, who was a key source for Bob Woodward and Carl Bernstein's reporting on the Watergate scandal.)

The author is being represented by Matt Latimer and Keith Urbahn of Javelin, the same literary agents who represented fired FBI Director James Comey and former White House press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders. The book was acquired with no advance, "in keeping with the author's identity with The Washington Post," according to people involved in the project. The author "feels their identity is protected," according to a statement about the book's release.

There are no modern historical parallels for a firsthand account of a sitting president written at the highest levels." The author feels their identity is protected," according to a statement about the book's release.

Warning" did not take an advance and intends to donate some of the royalties to nonprofit accountability and supporting truth-tellers in the Trump administration. The author is being represented by Matt Latimer and Keith Urbahn of Javelin, the same literary agents who represented fired FBI Director James Comey and former White House press secretary Sarah Huckabee Sanders. The book was acquired with no advance, "in keeping with the author's identity with The Washington Post," according to people involved in the project. The author "feels their identity is protected," according to a statement about the book's release.

There are no modern historical parallels for a firsthand account of a sitting president written at the highest levels. There is no modern historical parallel for a firsthand account of a sitting president written at the highest levels. There is no modern historical parallel for a firsthand account of a sitting president written at the highest levels. There is no modern historical parallel for a firsthand account of a sitting president written at the highest levels.