

Bio

Dan Levine has been reporting on the U.S. judicial system for 15 years, the last nine of them at Reuters. His stories cover a range of high profile legal issues including President Trump's travel ban, the death penalty and tech privacy. His investigation on difficulties facing undocumented crime victims who cooperate with law enforcement led to a new California law to help them. During his time writing about legal issues it has become more and more challenging to explain the workings of our federal and state courts because of a growing number of confidential settlements, sealed motions and even closed hearings.
