

Dylan Hedtler-Gaudette is a Government Affairs Manager at POGO. In this role, he advocates for good government policy solutions in a range of issue areas, including judicial ethics and transparency, greater accountability and openness at the Department of Justice, enhancing the capacity and integrity of Congress, protecting against undue foreign influence, and the preservation of core constitutional principles, such as the separation of powers and the power of the purse.

Dylan is an expert on judicial and congressional ethics, congressional reform, foreign influence, DOJ independence, and emergency powers and he has written extensively on these and other subjects. He has been cited in various news outlets, including, the Washington Free Beacon, Roll Call, the Washington Examiner, WGBH, the Washington Post, PBS NewsHour, Government Executive, and Federal News Network.

Dylan was born and raised in Maine where he completed his undergraduate studies in political science and economics at the University of Southern Maine. He then attended graduate school at Northeastern University in Boston, Massachusetts, where he obtained a Master's degree in international relations. Dylan has spent his career pursuing the common good through work in the nonprofit space, including at a global anti-poverty organization and a national disability rights group.